CHAPTER III. MANPOWER MANAGEMENT^{1/}

A. CIA Personnel Strength and Other Personnel Trends, 1953-1956

T/O Ceiling and On Duty Strength

In its brief "History of the Personnel Management Function in the Central Intelligence Agency" prepared for the Clark Committee, the Office of Personnel in August 1954 described the general change in the Agency personnel policy that came during the transition from the Smith to the Dulles administrations as follows: "Stabilization of staffing requirements appeared during the Fiscal Year 1953 which, accompanied by changes in the concepts of internal Agency security requirements, made it possible to give increasing effort and attention to the overall elements of personnel management within the agency."^{2/}

^{1/} This chapter was drafted by [REDACTED] in November 1959.

^{2/} Office of Personnel, Survey Task Force Black Book, 12 August 1954, SECRET, in files of OP.

During the Smith administration, the rapidly expanding scope of the Agency's intelligence and operational activities and commitments dictated an acceleration of personnel operations to supply the increasingly expanded personnel requirements. This is illustrated by the increase in staff employees and staff agents on duty from [REDACTED] in December 1950, to [REDACTED] in December 1952.^{1/} These figures did not include foreign nationals, contract employees, contract agents, or employees of proprietary organizations who also increased in numbers.^{2/} In order to expand as rapidly as the Agency did, it was

^{1/} Staff employed and staff agents had to be U.S. nationals. A staff agent was a person who was a staff employee, but who, for cover purposes, resigned as a staff employee. During the period a staff agent retained his rights as a staff employee.

^{2/} A contract agent was a U.S. or foreign national, engaged under a written contract, either by headquarters or in the field, to perform operational activities (as distinguished from administrative or staff-type support duties), outside the United States. A contract employee was any individual employed on either a full or part-time basis for the primary purpose of performing staff-type support functions. See CIA [REDACTED] dated 22 August 1956, Contract Personnel, SECRET, in Records Center and Office of Training Reference Manual No. 0-1, January 1957, SECRET, in OTR files. For a discussion of these non-staff employees, see below.

necessary to set the personnel requirements even higher. The maximum number of positions in the tables of organization of the Agency was reached in October 1952 when some [REDACTED] positions were listed.^{1/}

The listing of positions in tables of organization was one of the devices of personnel management used during the period 1953-1956.^{2/} As during the Smith Administration of CIA, the responsibility for timely submission of proposed T/O's or changes thereto rested with operating officials, the responsibility for the review of organizational and functional changes in T/O's including quantitative evaluations as to manpower and numbers and types of positions required rested with the Management Staff under its different names and organizational locations, and the responsibility for the review of position classification changes rested with the Office of Personnel. The Comptroller examined the proposed T/O's in the light of budgetary, fiscal and allied matters. Where appropriate, the Logistics Office considered problems of space and related matters. The DD/A (subsequently DD/S) was authorized to approve those proposed T/O's which were concurred in by all officials concerned. Where there was non-concurrence, the proposal and all supporting papers were submitted to DCI for determination.

During the period the T/O was differentiated from the staff ceiling. The latter was a limiting figure which established the maximum number of personnel who might occupy positions on Agency T/O's in duty status, at any given time, subject to availability of funds.^{1/} It did not indicate what positions on a T/O should be occupied but merely how many. The initiative in the case of a T/O change was with the operating official, who, if he was satisfied with his T/O, did nothing until prodded. The Agency T/O position total at any given time was merely the sum total of the office T/O's as obtained by a machine listing. There was a tendency for T/O's to become out of date since operating officials resisted losing positions on their T/O's, as these positions could be filled if the ceiling were lifted. A management survey of a given office usually resulted in a proposal for a new T/O.^{1/} Changes in the T/O took place piecemeal and there was no requirement in the beginning of the Dulles administration for periodic revision of the T/O. On the other hand, the DCI on his own initiative or acting on instructions from the President or the Bureau of the Budget could set a single personnel ceiling figure for the entire Agency. In setting such a personnel ceiling figure, the DCI also fixed a personnel ceiling figure for each of the main components.

^{1/} CIA [REDACTED] dated 15 May 1956, Tables of Organization, SECRET, in Records Center.

^{1/} An example is Report of the Management Survey, Office of Training, dated 14 January 1955, SECRET, in Management Staff files, which is Request for Approval of Table of Organization.

Each Deputy Director was allowed to distribute this personnel ceiling among the offices under him.^{1/}

The personnel ceiling was not static. The annual budget process usually brought personnel ceiling changes at the beginning of the new fiscal year on the 1st of July.^{2/} Releases from the reserve fund for new projects involving additional staff personnel would bring increases in the personnel ceiling. Liquidation of projects involving abolition of staff positions would bring reductions in the personnel ceiling. As in the case of T/O changes, the DD/A (subsequently the DD/S) was authorized to approve personnel ceiling changes agreed to by all officials concerned and to refer disagreements to the DCI for determination.^{3/}

At the beginning of the period the number of T/O positions was much higher than the personnel ceiling.

As of December 31, 1952 the number of T/O positions was [REDACTED] and the personnel ceiling was [REDACTED], including staff civilian and military personnel.^{1/} The difference between the two figures as of this date may be explained on the ground that, as planning documents, the T/O's had been set during the Korean war and other crises when it appeared that heavy demands would be placed on the Agency and the revision of the position requirements downward had been slow after the international situation eased and there was an anticipated change in administration in Washington.

During the period the trend in the total T/O positions was steadily downward with the biggest drop occurring in January 1954.^{2/} In July 1954 the DCI requested the AD/P to prepare a directive which would state a goal of reducing T/O's to ceiling figures.^{3/}

^{3/} Memorandum for C/P & A Staff/OP from EO/OP, 28 July 1954, Subject: Reduction in Agency Strength, SECRET, in Records Center Job 57-596.

This continued to be the policy of the Agency for the rest of the period as shown by the following statement made by DD/CI on September 1956: "It will continue to be the policy to have Tables of Organizations and ceilings as nearly the same as is practical, bearing in mind that the ceilings are, in effect, a control of the on-duty strength rather than the number of positions on the T/O."^{1/} By the end of the period this objective substantially achieved. As of December 31, 1956 the T/O position total was [REDACTED] and the ceiling total was [REDACTED]. During the second half of the period plans were being made to modify the procedures for establishing and changing T/O's in order to make them a more useful tool of personnel management.^{2/}

The personnel ceiling was closely related to the budget process. Funds for personnel were always an important item in the Agency budget. The original personnel requirements for Fiscal Years 1953 and 1954 were contained in budget estimates prepared by the Truman administration. The new Eisenhower administration began at once to investigate the possibilities of trimming these estimates.^{1/} On February 3, 1953, Mr. Dodge, the new Director of the Bureau of the Budget, sent to all agencies, including CIA, a letter calling for a review of personnel utilization and vacancies, going and proposed construction projects, and for the elimination of unnecessary programs and restriction of others to minimum levels.^{2/} As far as possible, agencies were to eliminate vacancies.

1/ In his message on the State of the Union, delivered February 2, 1953, President Eisenhower called for a balanced budget and elimination of the deficit. See President Eisenhower's Public Papers, 1953 ed. On April 30, 1953, President Eisenhower reported on his efforts to trim the Fiscal Year 1954 budget. New York Times, May 1, 1953.

2/ New York Herald Tribune, February 4, 1953, gives the directive.

The estimates for personal services in original requirements presented to Congress for Fiscal Year 1953 were based on existing tables of organization plus anticipated needs.^{1/} This method produced a requirement of around [REDACTED] positions. In November 1952 General Smith made a statement: "It's a simple fact that while we have budgeted for a rather large personnel ceiling, we can't get qualified people to fill that personnel ceiling. They just simply don't exist. We've gone about the limit. . . . So, my intention is to keep our numbers down, to be selective instead of expansive, and look more and more to the juniors to fill senior posts."^{2/} Before Mr. Dodge's directive had been received by CIA,

Smith and his Answers to Questions Submitted at the 8th Agency Orientation Course, 21 November 1952, in Office of Training Bulletin, 11 February 1953, SECRET, in HS files. General Smith, in these remarks, did not use the word "ceiling" in its technical sense. He probably meant budgeted positions or total positions in T/O's.

General Smith had reduced the original personnel requirements for Fiscal Year 1954 by 25 percent.^{1/}

Following the receipt of the directive from Mr. Dodge, the DD/A of CIA recommended that each Deputy review the situation in his area and submit to the Comptroller, by February 20, 1953, his revised estimates for personnel and funds for the remainder of Fiscal Year 1953 and for Fiscal Year 1954. Mr. Dulles, who became Acting Director on February 9 and Director on February 26, supported this move.^{2/} As a result of the hearings before the subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee held in the spring of 1953 in which Mr. Dulles participated it was agreed that the Agency would limit its civilian staff personnel to not more than [REDACTED]^{3/} In connection with the allocation of funds and personnel for Fiscal Year 1954 made in August 1953 this ceiling was put into effect. In essence it was based on the Dodge formula since it took the on-duty strength of civilian staff employees under ceiling as of June 30, 1953 plus some 500 additional positions needed to carry out increased missions.^{1/} According to Office of Personnel figures, the ceiling for civilian staff employees dropped from [REDACTED] as of June 1953 to [REDACTED] as of August 1954.^{2/} In addition there was a ceiling of [REDACTED] for military personnel which remained unchanged for both of these dates. The new ceiling cut below on-duty strength plus the number of those in process.^{3/} During the Fiscal Year 1954 the personnel ceiling rose slightly each month and the number of those in process dropped gradually until March 1954 when those on-duty plus the number in process equaled the ceiling. The more than 500 on-duty civilians who were exempt from ceiling gave the Agency some flexibility.^{1/}

The budgeted civilian positions in the estimates presented to Congress in March 1954 for the Fiscal Year 1955 were [REDACTED] the same as for Fiscal Year 1954.^{2/} The CIA position was that the Agency should not get too large and that it should plan to stay within this number.^{3/} According to monthly figures compiled by the Office of Personnel, the ceiling did exceed this number during Fiscal Year 1955.^{1/} Increases in the budgeted positions were made during Fiscal Year 1955 in the Director's Office and in the offices under DD/P.^{2/} The additional requirements for personal services that arose during the year were related to releases from the reserve fund which were authorized by the Bureau of the Budget for a new sensitive signal intercept project and for additional cold war activities in the Far East, the Near East, and the Western Hemisphere.^{3/}

Congress was requested to grant, and granted, appropriation authority for [REDACTED] civilian positions.^{2/} In an internal communication regarding the proposed budget, General Cabell, Deputy Director, said: "We now have a base infinitely better prepared to assimilate selected development and expansion than we possessed in 1952. Clearly our mission calls for expansion, limited only by our ability to plan and absorb it in an orderly and effective manner. Hence, we should, for example, devote maximum staff effort towards the earmarking and training of personnel assets for such future development even if it requires lifting personnel ceilings and dipping into 1956 reserve. . . ."^{3/}

25X1A In preparing estimates for the operating budget for Fiscal Year 1956, the various components requested in July 1955 increases over civilian on-duty strength of approximately [REDACTED] positions.^{1/} The DCI agreed that certain high priority projects had to have additional personnel but he was not convinced that such a large general increase was necessary and practical. He felt that the Agency should not expand appreciably without consulting the Bureau of the Budget and Congress. In a memorandum to the Deputies of August 5, 1955, he stated his position on personnel:

It is my desire to keep the Agency as small as possible consistent with the successful accomplishment of our mission. It behooves us all to find ways and means to do more without greatly expanding our numbers. We must resist any suggestions that we assume duties which are not clearly our function or which we have not been assigned as a service of common concern. We must also pay greater attention to the establishment of priorities and through constant analysis and evaluation eliminate marginal projects and programs. We should explore thoroughly all possibilities of contracting for our work to avoid increasing our numbers where we can within the bounds of good security.^{1/}

Of the increases in civilian positions requested for operating budget for Fiscal Year 1956, about one-half were allowed. Three-fourths of the additional positions allowed were used specifically for two sensitive intelligence operations and for the signal intercept program.^{2/} The new budgeted civilian position total was [REDACTED]^{3/} Of this total some 500 positions were not new. They were the positions for 500 project employees who had formerly been budgeted under "other contractual services."

In preparing its estimates for personal services for Fiscal Year 1957, for submission to the Bureau of the Budget the Agency presented practically the same number of civilian positions as it used for the operating budget for Fiscal Year 1956.^{1/} In other words, the big increases requested by the offices in their original estimates of required positions were not granted.^{2/} In a statement prepared for General Cabell's use in connection with the Bureau of the Budget hearings in October 1955, the view was expressed: "It is probably a fact that in the application of our resolve to keep our ceiling down, we have penalized Intelligence results. This is particularly true in the overt area where the scope and depth of Intelligence analysis, and hence the Intelligence product, is a direct function of the numbers and quality of the personnel available to do the work. Of course there are other factors too, but not in the direct proportion."^{1/} The same number of civilian positions was requested in the Congressional Budget for Fiscal Year 1957.^{2/} This budget was approved by Congress without change.

In connection with the preparation of the Operating Budget for Fiscal Year 1957, the offices requested an over-all increase of 672 civilian positions.^{3/} The DCI decided against granting these increases and held each component to the number of positions requested in the Congressional Budget.^{4/} General Cabell, Acting Director, informed each Deputy that newer developments would be given adequate support within the allowances by dropping activities of lesser priority. He indicated that he was particularly interested in the proper staffing of a new activity of DD/I and of the activities in the WH and NEA Divisions and the CI Staff of DD/P.^{1/}

The number of staff employees on duty was a constantly changing figure which depended upon the balance between the number of new employees entering on duty (EOD's) and the number of separations. The Office of Personnel reported the Agency gains and losses on a monthly basis. The trend in the number of staff employees on duty was steadily upward during the period except for Fiscal Year 1954 when there was a net loss of 12. The number of civilian staff employees and military personnel on duty as of December 31, 1952 was [REDACTED] and the number on duty as of December 31, 1956 was [REDACTED]^{2/} The net gain for the second half of Fiscal Year 1953 was 358, the net gains for Fiscal Years 1955 and 1956 were respectively 579 and 605, and the net gain for the first half of Fiscal Year 1957 cent. This modest increase was in contrast to the large increase in personnel strength between October 1950 and February [REDACTED]

A marked trend for the period was the lessening of the gap between the T/O and the on-duty strength and between the ceiling and the on-duty strength. Whereas the T/O at the end of 1952 was [REDACTED] over the on-duty strength, the T/O at the end of 1956 was only [REDACTED] the on-duty strength. The differences between the ceiling and the on-duty strength were [REDACTED] at the end of 1952 and [REDACTED] at the end of 1956. In addition to the civilian staff employees and the military personnel, both of which groups were composed of U.S. nationals, the Agency employed temporary and part-time employees, consultants and foreign nationals. During Fiscal Year 1956, the average employment in man years was [REDACTED] for temporary and part-time employees, [REDACTED] for consultants, and [REDACTED] for natives of foreign countries.^{1/}

Returning to staff employees, the figures for on-duty strength by department and field show varying rates of change during the period. Departmental strength rose from [REDACTED] as of December 31, 1952 to [REDACTED] as of December 31, 1956 or [REDACTED] per cent and [REDACTED] strength rose from [REDACTED] or [REDACTED] per cent. The [REDACTED] additional employees on duty in [REDACTED] installations were divided almost equally between special projects in the Director's Office [REDACTED]^{2/} The net foreign field on-duty strength declined from Reductions were heaviest in [REDACTED] and the Far East where changed political conditions made it difficult to maintain staffs as large as they had been in early 1953. The end of the [REDACTED] brought a reduction in number of positions in Agency installations in that country. The number of paramilitary and other positions was reduced in the Far East. Special procedures were established to determine priorities as between different overseas field stations. As these priorities changed, the personnel strength of overseas stations changed, subject to lags caused by scarcity of qualified personnel, difficulties in establishing cover, delays in project planning, and other delays.

On-duty strength of staff employees by main component show that the largest net increases came in DD/S and DCI areas. An increase of [REDACTED] in the Office of the DCI was largely in special projects and the message center. The increases in descending order that contributed to the nearly [REDACTED] increase in the DDS area were

The average GS grade of CIA staff personnel was 8.0 as of December 31, 1952, and 8.9 as of December 31, 1956.^{2/} In terms of the distribution of GS grades, this increase in the average grade was the result of two factors. One was the increase in the proportion of staff personnel holding grades GS-13-18 and the other was the decrease in the proportion holding grades GS-01-06. The proportion of those holding grades GS-07-12 remained constant during the period for the Agency as a whole.^{1/}

As compared with the average grade of all Federal employees, which rose from GS-5.6 to GS-6.0 during the period, the average grade of CIA employees was high. On the other hand, when the Foreign Service staffs of the United States Information Agency were converted to GS grades, the average of USIA was higher than that of CIA for the calendar year 1956.^{2/} For the calendar year 1953 the average grade of the Civil Aeronautics Agency was higher than that of CIA but after this year the average grade of CIA forged ahead. When the Department of State Foreign Service staffs were converted to GS grades, the Department of State average grade was higher in 1953 but lower in 1956 than CIA's average-grade. As compared with the average grade of Atomic Energy Commission and Federal Bureau of Investigation, the average CIA grade was higher and showed a sharper increase throughout the period.^{1/}

The proportion of men in GS-07-12 grades declined (from 63.5 per cent to 58.8 per cent) and the proportion of women these grades rose (from 32.6 per cent to 39.3 per cent.) When the two were combined the ratio of total employees in these grades remained the same for both dates.

The Bureau of the Budget was concerned during the period with the increasing average grade of CIA employees.^{2/} Toward the end of the period a general Budget Circular stated positively: "The estimates will not provide increases in appropriations or other funds to cover within-grade salary advances."^{3/} In connection with the hearings on the CIA Estimates for Fiscal Year 1957 held in October 1955, the Bureau of the Budget suggested a decrease in the average grade. of the Comptroller pointed out to the DD/S that it would be impractical to reduce the grades of employees in order to meet the proposed cuts. The increase in average grade was connected with high priority activities.^{1/}

The highest positions in the Agency, the supergrades which included GS-16, 17, and 18, were under special rules during the period. As of December 31, 1952, the DCI himself was the final approving authority for the establishment of positions at the supergrade level.^{2/}

In January 1954 the DCI issued a regulation which established a Supergrade Review Board to review and recommend to him the disposition of all actions affecting individuals assigned to or recommended for assignment to positions in the supergrade category.^{3/} The Board

The Position Evaluation Division of the Office of Personnel assisted the Director of Personnel in preparing the requirements for supergrade positions to be recommended to the Supergrade Review Board, which reviewed these position descriptions and finally approved them. The supergrade system was periodically overhauled by the Director of Personnel working with the Deputy Directors who furnished facts regarding the organization, the tasks to be done, and the qualities of persons needed to fill the positions.

During the period the supergrade position structure of CIA was revised several times. In the spring of 1954 the Supergrade Review Board recommended 1.40 per cent as a reasonable rate for CIA supergrade positions on the basis of comparisons made with the Department of State, the Atomic Energy Commission and the Federal Civil Defense Administration.^{1/} A survey made in 1955 concluded that the composite supergrade ratio of the Department of State, Foreign Operations Administration, Atomic Energy Commission, and U.S. Information Agency provided a sound and defensible basis for establishing and periodically adjusting the CIA supergrade authorization.^{2/} For purposes of external Agency comparison, all full-time positions with authorized salary levels equivalent to or above the base of the GS-16 grade level were included, regardless of the type of authority for the rate. As of March 31, 1955 CIA had only 0.88 per cent of its employees in supergrade positions as compared with the Department of State which had nearly 2 per cent of its employees in such positions. The Director concurred with the recommendation that the results of position analysis and evaluation were advisory rather than controlling. This was corollary to the principle that supergrade rank was in the person, and that supergrade individuals were subject to assignment in any capacity where they were needed and for which they possessed the required qualifications. The policy was

B. CAREER SERVICE PROGRAM 1953-1956^{1/}

1. Objectives

The development of a corps of well-qualified intelligence personnel who sought to make a career of Agency employment was officially expressed by General Smith early in 1951.^{2/} During the balance of his administration of CIA^{3/} and during the first four years of the Dulles administration, officials from all parts of the Agency participated in intensive efforts to develop a realistic program for selecting, developing and appropriately rewarding members of such a corps.

The activities of the CIA Career Service Board, established in June 1952, and of component Career Service Boards stimulated the interest of Key officials in personnel management and provided a means for ironing out personnel policy issues at the Agency level.^{1/}

On August 3, 1954, the CIA Career Conference, called by the Career Council, successor on July 1, 1954, to the Career Service Board, was convened for the purpose of discussing the recommendations of the Board and its task forces. The Conference was attended by the Director and the Deputy Director of Central Intelligence, the CIA Career Council and over 600 supervisors of the Agency. The new regulations on the career staff, career development of junior personnel, fitness report, promotion, rotation, and career benefits were fully explained.

At this Career Service Conference Mr. Dulles reaffirmed his strong belief in the desirability of a career service which would furnish assurances of continuity, job satisfaction, and advancement. He also stressed the vital role of supervisors in making the career service a success, especially their responsibility for the proper selection, utilization, and promotion of personnel.^{1/}

At the Bureau of the Budget hearings on October 27, 1954, General Cabell made the following statement summarizing the features of the CIA Career Service Program:

. . . The problem of a career service has been under study for about three years and it was officially started on August 3. Basically the employee states that he intends to make a career of service with the Agency and agrees to serve anywhere and at any time for any kind of duty as determined by the Agency. The Agency commits itself to give full consideration to the employees particular capabilities, interests, and personal circumstances. Under the program the employee is assured a reassignment after his return from an overseas assignment provided his service has been satisfactory. Preferential consideration will be given career employees in special training and in filling vacancies by promotion. It is planned to develop junior personnel, through overseas rotation and special training, into a hard corps of highly competent employees who will assure competent direction of the Agency in the future. Studies are now being made of possible improvements in our career program which may require legislative authorization. These include special medical benefits, educational allowances, a more liberal retirement program, and certain home leave benefits for employees who have served long periods of time outside the continental limits of the United States . . . The development of a strong career service is considered essential to the long term objective of establishing a highly trained, competent, and dedicated staff which can most effectively carry out the Agency's mission with a minimum number of people.^{1/}

In 1960, after some eight and a half years experience with various career service plans, the Inspector General indicated that he regarded the chief purposes of a career service in CIA to be: (1) A means to advance Intelligence as a profession, (2) a means to assure the selection of capable young people, and (3) a means to train and prepare the right individuals for top jobs for both the present and the future.^{2/}

During the first four years of the Dulles administration of CIA progress toward the purposes mentioned above was made along several lines. The development of some two dozen Office Career Service Boards, the establishment of the Career Staff for the Agency as a whole, improvements in the technical services and advice rendered by the Office of Personnel and other units of the Agency concerned with personnel functions, the continued expansion of the Junior Officer Trainee Program administered by the Office of Training, and improvement in personnel management policies in the fields of recruitment and personnel utilization -- all of these developments contributed substantially to the advancement of the career service program.

2. Career Services

At the beginning of 1953 the CIA Career Service Program was controlled by the CIA Career Service Board which consisted of the Deputy Director (Administration), chairman, the Deputy Director (Plans), the Deputy Director (Intelligence), the Assistant Director (Personnel), the Director of Training and, on a rotating basis, two Assistant Directors. This Board was responsible for developing policy governing the Career Service Program and for supervising the functioning of (Office) Career Service Boards which were located in each of the major Offices and units of CIA and were responsible to their respective Assistant Directors or Office heads for the operation of the Career Service Program.^{1/}

During the following four years there were changes in the composition of the CIA Career Service Board, the Board itself was replaced by CIA Career Council in 1954, and the Office Boards were changed to fit new organizational patterns. The Inspector General, Mr. Lyman B. Kirkpatrick, became the Chairman of the Board in place of Mr. Walter Reid Wolf, Deputy Director (Administration) on April 24, 1953.^{2/} Mr. Kirkpatrick served as chairman until the Board was replaced by the Council on June 25, 1954 at which time the Assistant Director for Personnel was made the Chairman of the new Council.^{3/} At the time that the council was created there were established some sixteen Career Services,^{1/} but these were reduced in December 1955 to five Career Services four of which has subordinate Boards or Panels.^{2/}

In order to fix responsibility for the career planning of Agency personnel, all career employees, defined as Staff Employees and Staff Agents, were given "career designations."^{3/} The initial career designation was predicated on the placement of career employees under the Office Career Service Board which corresponded to the type of work officially assigned. Any career employee could request a change in his career designation. Such a request had to be approved by the Career Service Board concerned. The Assistant Director (Personnel) was made responsible for assigning an appropriate career designation for each new staff employee entering on duty. A two year tour of duty with another component would not ordinarily affect a staff employee's career designation. Thus, a Clandestine Services operations officer with Foreign Intelligence as his career designation might serve with the Office of Training for two years without any change in his career designation.

The career service mechanism started with the operating components and the Career Service Boards. Supervisors recommended a promotion, a transfer, a termination, a training assignment, an award, and this action was reviewed by the career service system in order to insure that the decision took into consideration office-wide and Agency-wide considerations.

In January 1954, the Inspector General told the DCI that the Office Career Service Boards had "functioned with varying degrees of effectiveness and authority," that some were "purely advisory" and that others had more influence, that they concerned themselves largely with matters of promotion, transfers, etc. -- personnel actions previously handled on a routine basis by executive action of the individual offices, and that they had continued office nationalism and done nothing to further making CIA a career.^{1/}

In a study of the Career Service Program made six years later, the IG was again critical of the Office Career Service Boards and Panels.^{2/} He recommended that the existing twenty-six services should be changed to five services which would be divided along occupational lines (Administration, Clerical, Technician, Specialist, Intelligence, and possibly a Communications Service separate from the rest.) Membership in one of the new services - the Intelligence Career Service - would be limited to "the hard core of professional intelligence officers."

In defense of the system as it had existed, the DD/S said that the Career Service had by no means been a failure, and several important accomplishments should be at least partially attributed to this system. He thought that the program had done much to bring line management to face up to its responsibilities in the field of personnel management.^{1/}

3. Career Staff

The creation of the Career Staff on July 1, 1954 introduced a new and basic concept in the long range personnel administration of CIA.^{2/} Whereas there had been various personnel programs in the Agency before this, notable among which was the Career Service Program that had been in effect since July 13, 1952, there had never before been a service to which an individual could belong. The Career Staff was defined as a group of carefully selected and trained individuals who accepted an obligation to devote themselves to the needs of the Agency, and who intended to make a career with the Agency. The idea of an elite corps was rejected, and every staff employee or staff agent, regardless of grade, could apply. Consideration for selection into the Career Staff was based upon voluntary application by personnel who had completed the provisional period of three years of satisfactory service with the Agency. The application form indicated that the applicant accepted the obligation to serve anywhere and at any time and for any kind of duty as determined by the needs of CIA and it assured him that, full consideration would be given to his particular capabilities, interests and personal circumstances, that just and equitable attention would be given to his personal progress, and that reassignment compatible with his abilities and career interests would be offered to him on his satisfactory completion of any assignment.

The system was based upon mutual assurances, on the part of the Agency as well as of the individual, of good faith, intent and purpose, rather than on specific and binding legalistic or contractual matters. The so-called "benefits," therefore, were largely intangible and demonstrable only over a period of time, rather than being guarantees of any specific promotion, advancement, assignment or development action.^{1/} An employee who failed to become a member of the Career Staff would lose out on certain opportunities. He would not be eligible for certain awards such as the language awards, he could not be selected for one of the major war colleges, and he would endanger his opportunities for rotation and promotion.

Since the system was based on the assumption that each staff employee who had been with the Agency for three years was a potentially suitable member of the Career Staff, the selection criteria were negative and were designed to seek out reasons why an individual should not be granted membership. Procedures were developed to review the record of each candidate in order to make sure that the assumption about his suitability was correct. The candidate's supervisor, the Head of his Career Service, the Career Board, the Examining Panel, and finally the CIA Selection Board which consisted of nine top officials including the Assistant

^{1/} Office of Personnel, Selection Staff Report on Programs and Program Plans, 1 July 1954-30 June 1955, SECRET, in OP files.

Director for Personnel reviewed the candidates record. Members of the Panel of Examiners were appointed by the Director of Central Intelligence from among the members of the Career Staff, GS-14 and above, nominated by the Heads of Career Services and recommended by the CIA Selection Board. An examining panel consisted of three voting examiners selected by the Executive Director of the CIA Selection Board.^{1/} Information concerning the work performance, conduct or status of applicants was obtained from the following seven Offices of Record: Office of Personnel, Office of Security, Office of Training, Medical Staff, Office of the Comptroller, the Inspector General, and Inspection and Review Staff. 25X9

25X9 During the first ten months that the Career Staff system was in effect over [REDACTED] staff employees and staff agents applied for membership. As of April 27, 1955 some [REDACTED] applications had been accepted and a ceremony was held on that date inaugurating the CIA Career Staff. At this ceremony the Director said that he could not think of any job that would give a man or woman a better opportunity to exercise all his talents, his abilities, his ingenuity, than intelligence work. He added:

I don't know any line of work where a Career Service is more needed than it is in intelligence. It is only through training, it is only through experience, it is only through trial and error--and we all make mistakes--that one can build up qualities and capabilities to do good intelligence work, and it is needed all the way down the line. The person who is working in filing is just as important, in many ways, as the person who is reaching the top decisions. If you don't have your papers before you to make those decisions, you don't make the right decision, and if they don't get there quickly you miss opportunities. So I want to tell each one of you, no matter what your particular job may be, that it is vital to the entire teamwork of the Agency. That is why we have this Career Staff right across the board, and we are not sectionalizing it in different departments or sections of the Agency. It is one career, with various facets, whether one is in the estimating side of the work or whether one is in the intelligence gathering side of the work, analyzing side, administrative side--it is all one work, one career, and one great opportunity to do service for the Government.1/

Applications for membership in the Career Staff were accepted, deferred, or denied by the CIA Selection Board. Those that were deferred were reconsidered every six months until a decision was reached. As of December 31, 1956, some [REDACTED] on duty personnel had become eligible to apply. Only 4.3 per cent had not returned their applications as of that date. All candidates were given 90 days to return their signed applications or to prepare a reply indicating why they were declining to apply. If neither a signed application nor a declination was received, an entry was made that the candidate had failed to return his application. Of the [REDACTED] applications which had been considered by the CIA Selection Board as of December 31, 1956, [REDACTED] were accepted, 147 were deferred, 58 were denied, and 14 declinations were accepted.^{1/} In other words, only [REDACTED] were deferred or denied. About 16 percent of those deferred or denied resigned from the Agency. In 69 percent of the deferred or denied cases, the Board used performance criteria, in 14 percent habitual indebtedness, in 11 percent intent, in 5 percent security consciousness, in 4 percent inter-personal relations, in 2 percent financial irresponsibility with Government funds, and it used other criteria applying to individual cases.^{2/}

The Inspector General's Survey on Career Service issued in 1960 indicated clearly that the idea of a Career Staff had been disappointing. The Survey recommended that the Selection Board and the Examining Panels be discontinued and that the selection of individuals into the Career Staff become the responsibility of the Heads of Career Services. The DD/S concurred in this recommendation.^{1/}

4. Personnel Management Advice and Services

a. Responsibilities

During the period the Office of Personnel continued to be responsible for professional and technical advice to the Director and to operating officials on personnel matters. It provided centralized personnel services, as appropriate, and monitored the Agency's personnel program on behalf of the Director.^{2/} Operating supervisors, on the other hand, were responsible for day-to-day personnel management activities in connection with the accomplishment of their missions. The philosophy of career service expressed by the DD/S placed heavy emphasis upon line management and the careful selection and training of supervisors and managers.^{1/}

Outside the Office of Personnel, a number of offices continued to exercise responsibility for specific personnel management functions. The Chief, Medical Staff provided professional medical and psychiatric services pertinent to determinations as to physical and emotional suitability of applicants for staff positions and staff personnel. The Director of Security on the basis of record checks, field investigations and polygraph tests made final security determinations and also included in reports of security investigations information pertinent to the suitability of the individual being investigated. The Director of Training took over the testing activities of the Office of Personnel, conducted all the Agency psychological testing programs and provided psychological evaluations exclusive of those contained within the medical program.^{1/} It also conducted the Junior Officer Trainee Program including recruitment and placement. Budgetary manpower control functions were exercised by the Comptroller's Office. Position evaluation and review of tables of organization functions were performed by the Management Staff. The Inspector General heard complaints of employees on a confidential basis. All of the above officers charged with personnel management responsibilities, except the Inspector General, were after February 1955, under the supervision of the DD/S who endeavored to harmonize their activities.^{2/}

b. Office of Personnel

The Director of Personnel continued to be responsible for representing the Agency on personnel matters which involved the U.S. Civil Service Commission, the Selective Service System, the Department of State, the Department of Defense and other agencies. The Agency's contacts with the Civil Service Commission were limited, being confined to such things as participation in the government-wide retirement system, observation of the requirements of the Veterans Preference Act in adverse actions against employees, the President's insurance program, and similar matters in which the Agency was not specifically exempted from the laws and regulations.^{1/}

The Office of Personnel conducted negotiations with the Department of State and the Department of Defense regarding the detail of personnel to CIA from those agencies.

Continued stress was placed on the service aspects of the work of the Office of Personnel. In his ten-point program for improving CIA's personnel management, the IG recommended in 1955:

Make "Service" the slogan of the Personnel Office, and see that every individual in that Office understands and acts accordingly. The Personnel Office should be advised that its mission is to do what CIA wants done in the Personnel field even though it does not coincide with Civil Service Practices.^{2/}

2/ Memorandum for DCI from IG, 25 February 1955, Ten Ways for Improving CIA's Personnel Management, SECRET, in O/DCI/ER.

In commenting on this recommendation, the Director of Personnel indicated to the DCI that he agreed with the principle and fact that the Office of Personnel existed solely to give service to the primary mission of the Agency. Staff members of the Office of Personnel had been informed repeatedly that they were in a fluid program rather than one rigidly controlled by statutes and that effectiveness depended on reaching common understanding with operating officials.^{1/} The DD/P commented that this point no longer seemed of overwhelming significance, and that in many respects, particularly in overseas processing, the Office of Personnel was demonstrating an outstanding sense of service.^{2/} general organization of the Agency. At the beginning of the period the Office was under the Deputy Director for Administration along with the Office of Security, the Comptroller's Office, and other offices concerned with management matters. In January 1954, it was placed in the Office of the Director where it remained for about a year.^{1/} Here it had a position which was parallel to the Office of Training which was also in O/DCI. This shift of the Personnel Office to O/DCI coincided with the appointment of Mr. Harrison G. Reynolds as Director of Personnel replacing Mr. George A. Meloon who had been Acting Director of Personnel. Mr. Reynolds was a business man who served in both World Wars and came into the Agency in 1947 [REDACTED] The 25X1A Deputy Director, General Cabell, had urged the shift in the position of the Personnel Office since he hoped to give considerable personal attention to manpower problems.^{2/}

During 1954, the DCI and the DDCI found it difficult to give the time to the Personnel Office that they had hoped to, so the DCI decided to shift the Office back to the Deputy Director for Administration and thus to concentrate responsibility for personnel matters in the Office that dealt with related matters. This was done by the same regulation which changed the name of DD/A to DD/S (Deputy Director for Support) and shifted the Office of Training and the Office of Communications as well from O/DCI to DD/S.^{1/} The year's experiment had not worked out as expected. The three Assistant Directors, AD/P, AD/C, and DTR, had not been eligible to attend the Deputies meetings when they were located in O/DCI. Under the new arrangement the DD/S kept them informed regarding what went on at the Deputies meetings. Another advantage was the ready access which DD/S had to DCI and DDCI. As far as the regular activities of the Office of Personnel were concerned, the shift to O/DD/S caused no dislocations. The DD/S established a Special Support Assistant for Personnel to act as the link between OP and DD/P on personnel matters.^{1/}

The new arrangement placed the question of the relationship between training and personnel management in the hands of DD/S. Early in 1956 the Inspector General in connection with a survey of the Junior Officer Training Program recommended the consolidation of OTR and OP into one central Office of Personnel and Training headed by one director with deputies for the two principal functions. The DD/S took the position that the JOT Program was only one small part of the total programs of these two offices, and would not in itself justify the merger of a number of incompatible units and functions into one central office. He opposed the organizational change and recommended that steps be taken to ensure that closest possible collaboration on this Program took place between the two offices.^{2/}

(2) Organization of the Office of Personnel

The main functions of the Office of Personnel remained unchanged during the years 1953 through 1956, but there were changes in the organization of the Office and in the names of the various sub-units. The principal reorganization took place on September 1, 1953 and in comparison with the sweeping changes made on that date other reorganizations were minor.^{1/} In the beginning of 1953, the Office of Personnel provided support service to the Agency's operating offices in the areas of recruitment, placement, promotion, and termination through two divisions-the Personnel Division (Overt) and the Personnel Division (Covert). The former provided assistance to the operating officers of the DD/I and the components of the DD/A and the assistant directors for Training and Communications and the latter provided services to the DD/P. PDO and PDC assigned placement officers to each of the operating offices. For example, PDC placement officers dealt directly with their counterparts in the senior staffs and the operating divisions of the Clandestine Services.^{1/} There were also separate personnel relations branches and separate personnel records processing units for the overt and covert parts of the Agency. The reorganization of September 1953 put the Personnel Office on a functional basis and did away with the separation at divisional level between services rendered to the overt and covert portions of the Agency. PDO and PDC were abolished and most of their functions were transferred to the new Placement and Utilization Division. Under the new organization there were overt and covert branches for assignment activities as well as for procurement and position classification.

In his immediate office, the Assistant Director for Personnel (renamed the Director of Personnel in 1955) had several key officers to assist him in personnel management planning and in the general direction of the office. Curiously enough, his chief assistant in 1953 was called Personnel Director (PD). The name of the position was changed to Deputy Assistant Director for Personnel (DAD/P) in 1954 and to Deputy Director of Personnel (DD/Pers) in 1955.^{1/} As a carry over from the previous administration, Mr. George A. Meloon, professional personnel officer, held this position until September 1955, when he was replaced by [REDACTED] [REDACTED] professional finance officer, who served through the remainder of the period and beyond.^{2/} In 1954 the position of Executive Officer (EO) was established.

(a) Planning Staff

During the period, a planning staff, under various names, was responsible for planning and directing the development and coordination of recommendations concerning Agency personnel policy, Career Service program objectives, personnel standards and procedures, including the development of appropriate regulatory issuances. This staff was divided in the beginning of the period into a Research and Planning Staff and a Career Development Staff. The latter staff was concerned primarily with giving staff support to the Career Service Board and its task forces.^{1/} The former staff conducted studies of personnel Office objectives, organization, staffing, and operating procedures and prepared statistical reports on personnel developments. In order to bring similar functions together, these two staffs were combined into a single staff on August 1, 1953, which was first called the Research, Planning and career Development Staff and later called the Plans, Research and Development Staff.^{2/} [REDACTED] who had been Chief of the Career Development Staff was placed in charge of the combined staffs. In June 1954 he was replaced by [REDACTED] and the name of the staff was changed to Planning and Analysis Staff.^{3/} In July 1954 the planning functions were again divided and [REDACTED] was placed in charge of the offshoot which was called the Career Service Staff whose chief function was to furnish staff support to the CIA Selection Board in the establishment of the Career Staff.^{1/} By June 1955, the Career Staff activities had settled down and the planning staffs were once again combined and this time they were placed under [REDACTED] as Deputy Director of Personnel for Planning and Development. Four Staff elements were put under his jurisdiction: Plans, Mobilization, Selection, and Development. Personnel mobilization planning was a new function which was concerned with assisting the Clandestine Services Planning Board in preparing personnel support annexes to cold war operations plans.^{2/} The Development Staff was also new and it was made responsible for monitoring career planning in the Agency and for

(b) Personnel Records

The reorganization of September 1, 1953 concentrated in the new Processing and Records Division responsibility for processing official personnel actions, for maintaining consolidated official records of Agency personnel activities including personnel actions, correspondence, applicant and employee files, and for operating a central processing service for personnel performing official travel.^{2/}

^{1/} This involved the administering of 40 senior development positions which could be used for training purposes. These positions were transferred from OTR to OP in December 1954 and they were cancelled in fall of 1956. The Junior Career Development program was for promising young persons already on the staff on contrast to Junior Officer Trainees who were recruited from outside.

^{2/} See Office of Personnel Memorandum No. 1-170-1, 10 June 1954, Functional Organization of the Office of Personnel, SECRET, in OP.

Prior to this the processing and records activities had been carried on in three different components of OP. In June 1955, the name of the Division was changed to Records and Services Division and it acquired part of the employee services functions from the Former Employee Services Division.^{1/}

25X9 The workload of the Division was impressive during the period. The handling of the personnel records presented space, filing, and management problems. In 1957 the Official Personnel Folder File alone occupied some 823 cubic feet of file space (the equivalent of some 100 four-drawer filing cases.)^{2/} Every year the Division conducted about 30,000 briefings, processed some [REDACTED] personnel appointment actions, handled some 5,000 promotion actions, processed some 30,000 other personnel actions, filed some 150,000 pieces of material, and wrote and sent some 44,000 letters.^{3/}

The guarding of the use of personnel files was a matter of continuing concern during the period. In 1955 the Inspector General recommended:

Place ironclad rules governing the use of personnel files. These should be available to only a limited number of senior officials in the Agency; and allowed out of the Personnel Office for only a limited time (48 hours). Further, the Personnel Office should devote a major effort to developing one master personnel file on each employee in which all pertinent information is placed. At present any employee who wishes to tamper with his personnel folder can do so with ease.^{1/}

A number of steps were taken to carry out these recommendations during the next few years. The Director of Personnel first pointed out that "the 48-hour rule would not be susceptible to universal application without observing an inflexibility which they had long sought to remove wherever possible."^{2/} It was the consensus that five working days constituted a reasonable time for such files to be in the custody of designated individuals. The existing rule required that the individuals entitled to withdraw personnel files from the Office of Personnel be designated in writing by individual Agency components.^{1/} In 1955 the Office proposed that stricter rules be applied to access to official personnel files and together with the Management Staff it developed a pre-and-post-charge check system which helped determine as nearly as possible the person responsible for any tampering.^{2/} As for master personnel files, work continued on converting all personnel files to a standard system, on placing papers in proper order and on searching out all papers which should be a matter of official record.^{3/}

During the period efforts were continued to improve the procedures for processing personnel actions. Joint study with the Management Staff resulted in a plan for making greater use of mechanical equipment in this process. Programmatic Flexowriters were adopted to cut tapes for automatic reproduction of standard information on requests for personnel actions and notifications of personnel actions, with the use of a converter device, to provide for automatic punching of this information into standard IBM cards used for personnel statistical purposes.^{1/}

(c) Staffing the Office of Personnel

While the Office of Personnel was not bound by the Civil Service Commission in recruiting its own staff, in practice it tended to recruit personnel experts who had had experience under Civil Service rules and who were prone to think in terms of those rules. One of the staffing problems of the Office of Personnel was to broaden the background of its own employees.

The Inspector General recommended in 1955 that the principle of rotation be applied vigorously to the staff of the Office of Personnel:

^{1/} Comptroller, Estimate of Requirements Fiscal Year 1958, dated 30 September 1956, Bureau of the Budget Presentation, SECRET, in Records Center Job 59-417.

Get fresh blood into the Personnel Office in the form of experienced and respected officers from other parts of the Agency, particularly DD/P. To do this give DD/S and D/Personnel the right to select ten GS-13 to GS-15's from other offices and place them in key Office of Personnel jobs on a career rotation basis. Simultaneously, place the Office of Personnel people elsewhere in the Agency where they will obtain broadening experience.1/

The Director of Personnel agreed that cross-fertilization was a must in personnel management as well as in any comparable business. He stated that the Office of Personnel had added to its staff experienced people from DD/P headquarters and from overseas stations.2/ During the period slow but steady progress was made in implementing the policy for interchanging personnel between the Office of Personnel and operating components.3/ One of the problems which the Office of Personnel faced in trying to rotate its key people was the lack of high-level personnel management positions overseas.

In 1953, the Inspector General called attention to the size of the staff of the Personnel Office in relation to the total number of staff employees. He made the following comment:

Using the figure of [REDACTED] staff employees, this represented one person in the Personnel Office for every [REDACTED] staff employees . . . This represents an extremely high proportion when the Independent Offices Appropriations Act in recent years has stipulated that there be one person in Personnel for every [REDACTED] employees.^{1/}

The Director of Personnel pointed out that the Agency required personnel specialists to perform functions which were not required in all Federal agencies and which would be excluded by the Bureau of the Budget in computing ratios.^{2/} For example, contracting, special recruitment, testing and central processing functions and overseas personnel administration would not be required in most other agencies. The [REDACTED] figure

The IG used the figure [REDACTED] for the Personnel Office. This included civilian and military personnel on duty. did not include contract personnel, special projects personnel, military personnel, and employees of proprietary organizations. Also, it was generally recognized that more personnel specialists were required in a new and growing organization in which basic personnel policy was being determined than would be needed in an established organization operating under the authority and guidance of the Civil Service Commission. In the report for Fiscal Year 1954, prepared according to instructions from the Bureau of the Budget, the Agency's ratio was 1 to [REDACTED] or practically the standard ratio.^{1/}

5. CIA Recruitment Policies and Practices

At the beginning of the period the Agency had to change over from an expansion-gearred recruitment program to one based almost exclusively on replacement of attrition. Because of high turnover rates, the recruitment of technical communications and clerical personnel continued at critical level both as to volume and urgency.

of the Office of Personnel was responsible for providing a program of overt and covert personnel procurement which included the development of recruitment sources and the procurement of qualified personnel to meet the Agency's staffing requirements.^{1/} The Office of Training was responsible for all testing programs, including tests for evaluation of professional, administrative, and clerical prospects. It also worked out a joint program with the Office of Personnel for recruiting Junior Officer Trainees. The Medical Staff was responsible for determining the physical and mental fitness of applicants. All applicants had to pass a rigid physical examination. Psychiatric examinations were given only in special cases where preliminary screening devices had identified neurotic tendencies. The function of the Medical Staff was to screen out persons who would not adjust to Agency needs. The Office of Security conducted the polygraph interviews and the field investigations in order to determine the applicant's suitability for employment from the standpoint of security.^{1/} Finally, the operating offices throughout the Agency continued to engage in recruiting activities of their own. In many cases, the initiative for finding candidates with the needed qualifications was taken by the Official who had the vacancy to fill and in all cases the final decision whether to go ahead with the recruitment process in a given case lay with that official.^{2/}

In July 1953 the DD/A took the initiative in bringing together three of the support offices concerned with Agency recruitment. He directed the Personnel, the Chief of the Medical Staff and the Director of Security to form a panel which would pool and coordinate marginal administrative information which each might develop in processing the case of any applicant

2/ A critical problem, according to DD/P, was that each recruitment had to be tied to a specific job. T/O's were so out of date that it was sheer accident if the man recruited against a particular slot filled the need that was greatest. for employment which by itself would be insufficient to result in a rejection under the employment standards for which each office had specific responsibility. By marginal administrative information was meant that which would raise a question as to the applicant's harmonious assimilation into the daily working life of the Agency. Bits of information regarding unpleasing habits or handicaps might furnish insufficient grounds for one office to base a rejection, but the combined information from the three offices might furnish sufficient grounds for such action. A panel of officials designated by the three offices met once a week to discuss as much information as possible regarding marginal cases as each office could furnish consistently with professional medical and security operating standards. All information furnished was weighed and recommendations were made to the Personnel Office to hire or reject the applicant. The Director of Personnel had the final word in such cases, subject to an appeal which a requesting component might make to the DD/S or the IG.^{1/}

An analysis of the reasons for applicant cancellations is useful in trying to understand why so many applicants had to be screened in order to secure the number entering on duty each year. The most numerous of the reasons given each year for voluntary cancellations was "accepted another position."^{1/} Many of these applicants became impatient while waiting to hear from their security investigation by the Agency. The two reasons given most frequently for involuntary cancellation of applications were security disapproval and "office no longer interested."

a. Assessment Services

A tradition of long-standing, going back to the days of the Office of Strategic Services, supported the use of psychological tests and various evaluative techniques by CIA as aids to those responsible for personnel management, especially those responsible for recruiting.^{2/} To be sure assessment was used not only to help supervisors and Career Service Boards in their recruitment but also in assignment, career planning, promotion, rotation, training, separation, and in other problems. While during the period the Office of Training took over the testing programs from other parts of the Agency,^{1/} the collecting of administrative and personality information and the conducting of polygraph interviews remained with the Office of Security, the conducting of psychiatric interviews remained with the Medical Staff, and the recruitment interview remained with the Office of Personnel. All of these services were supplemental to the work of the supervisor who had to decide whom he wanted to hire, and how he should fill out fitness reports. While the amount of information available on any single individual was considerable, efforts to bring all of this information together in a form that would be most useful to those responsible for personnel actions were not successful during the period.^{2/}

^{1/} OTR Notice No. 28-54, 1 December 1954, Reorganization of the Office of Training, SECRET, in OTR files, refers to Testing Services Branch of Assessment and Evaluation Staff, recently transferred from the Office of Personnel.

The purpose of the intensive assessment was to help determine the suitability of individuals for particular types of positions, especially those of a critical or sensitive nature. In 1953 intensive assessment involved two full days for the individual assessed, during which the individual took standard psychological written tests, projective tests, and situation tests, e.g., seminars and unrehearsed skits. During the Fiscal Year 1953 some 400 of these intensive assessments were given.^{1/} DD/P and OTR were generally satisfied with the quality of the assessment product.^{2/}

During the next four years the Assessment and Evaluation Staff of OTR developed a less time consuming assessment in addition to the intensive assessment. This was called the standard assessment and it involved the interpretation of test materials in the light of information furnished by supervisors. If the standard assessment did not answer all the questions, the supervisor might then ask for an intensive assessment which followed the pattern described above. During the Fiscal Year 1956 the total number of individuals assessed by standard or by intensive methods was over 600.^{1/} The A & E Staff received referrals for assessments from all offices of the Agency. Intensive assessment was routine for Junior Officer Trainees.

At the beginning of 1953, the testing of professional applicants was a rudimentary sort.^{2/} During the next four years the Assessment and Evaluation Staff developed a testing program aimed at producing information on a variety of intellectual skills, aptitudes, interests, and attitudes. At the end of the period, three professional testing batteries were in use: the Professional Applicant Test Battery, (PATB), the Professional Employee Test Battery, (PETB), and the Foreign Language Aptitude Test Battery, (FLATB.) A majority of professional applicants, including prospective Junior Officer Trainees, took the PATB which contained a rough measure of aptitude for learning a foreign language. The FLATB was given when a more precise measure was required by officials who were considering an individual for language training. The PETB was given to all professional employees. Those who were not tested as applicants (PATB) took the entire battery. Those who had received PATB within two years took only those tests which they had not taken previously. The PETB served as prerequisite for some OTR courses and it was also part of the assessment program. During the Fiscal Year 1953 some 800 individuals were given professional tests and during the Fiscal Year 1954 over twice that number.^{1/}

During the period the methods of giving tests were improved. The grading of tests was mechanized and the scores were put on IBM cards. This enabled the A & E Staff to standardize test results, to produce recrods quickly, and facilitated a program of evaluation of testing procedures.

The A & E Staff continued research during the period on the validity of test results. It found that the PETB had predictive value for performance in the Intelligence Orientation Course and that FLATB had predictive value on how well an individual would do in language training.^{1/} The Staff tried to develop tests that could be used to predict performance in the operation course but it found validation much more difficult in this field since the objectives of the operations courses were intangible and there were no standards to measure performance in the field.

b. Recruitment of Junior Officer Trainees (JOT's)

The origins of the Junior Officer Training Program (JOT) have been described in History of the Smith period.^{2/} The program was initiated in 1950 by General Smith who recognized that the Agency needed a planned, systematic method to identify, select, and develop career intelligence officers of the highest calibre. He was convinced that a sound intelligence agency must be built around key personnel who regarded intelligence as a career. Distinguished professors, outstanding military men, and leading experts would serve for brief periods but they soon went back to their fundamental jobs. Part of this career management program was the effort to select exceptionally qualified, highly motivated young people some of whom might become the ones to hold the key positions later on. In 1956, looking back on the JOT Program, the Acting Director of Training stated the Program had three steps: (a) identification and selection of young people of high potential; (b) appropriate formal Agency training; and (c) "tailored" on-the-job training, calculated to develop their potential and interest in intelligence work.^{1/}

Of the three steps listed above the second clearly belonged to the Office of Training. The first and third steps required close cooperation between the Office of Training and the Office of Personnel. In his Survey of the Office of Training in 1954, the IG stated that there was certain questioning as to whether the JOT Program was properly placed in OTR rather than the Office of Personnel.^{1/} The Director of Training had no doubts on this question. He contended that the administration of the Program belonged under OTR where all of the resources of this specialized Office could be brought to bear in the development of each individual's talents, that OTR should have full control of an responsibility for this training program since the JOT's were hired to be trained and accepted employment with this understanding, and that there was no evidence that the product of the Program would be improved by a change in its administrative control.^{2/} The Junior Officer Training Division was left in OTR during the period under discussion^{3/} although the IG raised the question again in 1956.

acceptable. The Office of Personnel had no general requirement of this sort for all professional applicants. In any case, JOT candidates had to have college degrees. Over one-half of those selected had graduate degrees.^{2/} In contrast to some other recruitment programs of the Agency, the candidates did not have to have professional or highly specialized degrees. They could not have foreign relatives and since 1956 those with foreign-born parents were not eligible without a special waiver.^{3/} They had to be medically approved for full duty and within the age limits of 21 and 35. This meant that they had to have eligibility for S. I. clearance and overseas employment. Additional qualities were also sought, such

The recruiting of JOT's differed from that of FSO's in that the Agency could not advertise its recruiting program generally as did the Department of State. It was also felt that the Agency would meet its needs better by a program of spotting likely candidates than by a system which left the initiative to applicants. The identification of likely prospects was accomplished by professional recruiters of the Office of Personnel who by university consultants who were situated in some 43 key educational institutions, and by staff employees who had contacts with colleges and universities. The Agency university consultants, selected jointly by OTR and the Office of Personnel, had to be fully cleared and they operated under strict instructions.^{1/} A small number of persons walked into the Personnel Office and asked for applications. An examination of the colleges from which JOT's were selected shows that over 72 different colleges from all parts of the United States were represented.^{2/}

In 1953 the selection procedure normally included some seven screenings which did not differ markedly from the recruitment procedures used for other professional personnel. The field recruiter made the first screening when he identified a subject for the program. An inspection of the files by the Personnel Procurement Division of the Office of Personnel constituted the second screening. If the candidate passed this test, his files were next examined by an OTR Placement Officer. The fourth step was taken by the Chief, Junior Officer Training Division, who decided whether or not the candidate would be interviewed and tested either in Washington or the field. The interview by the OTR Placement Officer and the psychological tests by the Assessment and Evaluation Staff constituted the fifth screening which was more thorough than the corresponding testing of other applicants. A candidate whose test results and interview reports were favorable was then interviewed by the Chief, Junior Officer Training Division. If his decision was favorable, the Director of Training then made the final decision by signing off on the file.^{1/}

^{1/} Survey of Office of Training, August 1953, Part II, Activities of Office of Training, SECRET, in Records Center Job 56-403.

During the first four years of the Dulles administration of the Agency the procedures for recruiting JOT's became more flexible and at the same time more refined. The psychological tests no longer had to wait for the fifth screening in Washington but arrangements were made to administer them at earlier steps in field locations convenient to candidates. This was done by setting up a field Career Development Program which used the well known commercial [REDACTED] to administer tests which had been developed by A & E Staff.^{1/} After the JOTP staff was expanded, additional screenings were made by the new Training Officers.^{2/} Promising candidates who passed the psychological tests were brought to Washington for a pre-employment medical examination, including a psychiatric examination to determine emotional stability, and for further interviewing by the JOTP staff. At this time the Chief of JOTP explained fully to the candidate what the Agency expected of him if he joined the Program. Another change which increased the flexibility of the Program was the initiation of security clearance before some of the other steps had been completed. If the screenings were favorable, the request for clearance would be confirmed. If unfavorable, the request for clearance would be cancelled.

In the fall of 1956 responsibility for all civilian personnel support for the JOTP was concentrated under one Personnel Officer working directly with the Program administrators.^{1/} The new position combined the Placement Officer function previously administered centrally in OP and the Personnel Officer function of OTR. In addition, several other responsibilities previously carried out by various Divisions in OP were taken over (Though administration of the tasks was not relocated in all cases.) The JOTP Personnel Officer soon established contacts with the Medical Staff, the Office of Security, Cover Division, all elements of OP, and those elements of OTR providing a service function such as A & E Staff and OTR Processing Section. This new arrangement proved to be a much improved method for expediting the procedural aspects of the Program.

The JOT's were broken down into two main groups: one which was not subject to the draft (veterans, 4-F's, and women), and the other which was draft-eligible. General Smith worked out an arrangement in 1951 with General Marshall, then Secretary of Defense, whereby the draft-eligible employees of the Agency would be taken into the various services, given basic training and OCS training and then returned to the Agency for training in intelligence as officers on detail for the remainder of their active duty commitment.^{1/} He believed that the discipline and character necessary to make effective intelligence officers could not be derived from the normal academic background but could be developed only in military service. Originally candidates upon the successful completion of OCS were assigned directly to the Agency. The Director of Training felt that a tour of duty with troops was also essential so a minimum of six months of troop duty or one year of ship duty was incorporated into the program. In April 1954, the arrangement with the Navy was terminated because of differences over financial details.^{1/}

The Officer Candidate School Program arranged for draft-eligible JOT's presented some problems which were examined from time to time by the Inspector General.^{2/} In 1953 the Program gained the reputation in some quarters for being a "cushy" substitute for the draft since a few recruiters had oversold it. This situation was improved by the issuance of instructions to recruiters and by the requirement of longer military service.^{1/} The attrition rate among the JOT's in the military program was higher than among male JOT's in the regular program. As of December 31, 1957, only 22 men out of the total of 201 in the regular program had left while connected with the program, while 51 out of 143 in the military program had left. In other words, the attrition rate was three times higher in the military program than in the regular program. Among the reasons given for this higher turn-over were that some candidates appeared to have misrepresented their intentions about career service either consciously or unconsciously and that some candidates were attracted by other opportunities during the eighteen months that they were away from the Agency.^{2/} On February 2, 1956, the IG recommended that the Agency sponsorship of military service of draft-

eligible JOT candidates be terminated but the DD/S did not concur in this recommendation and the DCI supported the DD/S position.^{1/}

The Program was designed to solve some of the recruitment problems of the Agency. More than one half of the professional employees recruited during the period, however, were obtained outside the JOT Program.^{2/} Supervisors did not want to give up the power they had to recruit their own employees and the JOT Program was not designed to select persons with advanced training in the sciences or with professional training in law, accounting, engineering, or medicine. Only occasionally was a JOT designated for the DD/S area. The Program did not avoid the problem of the Professional place of women in the intelligence program. The attrition rate of women JOT's, however, was twice that for regular

1/ As of December 31, 1957, 8 of the 46 women accessions to the Program had resigned. This was twice the rate for regular male accessions. Women JOT's married and gave up their professional careers. The attrition rate was probably not higher than for other women in the Agency. See Office of Personnel, Table 6, Annual Separation Rates of Staff Personnel, 1953-1956, SECRET, furnished to HS 19 January 1959.

2/ In his 1956 Survey the IG recommended that D/TR place increased emphasis on the selection and recruitment of non-Caucasian trainees for inclusion in the Program. See Op. cit. It was not until after 1956 that qualified non-Caucasian candidates were found. C/JOTP indicated that problems were encountered in trying to locate eligible Negro candidates. The Security Office found that many Negroes had signed Communist-front organization petitions in college, that the parents of some Negro college graduates were security risks, that Negro candidates did not stand up well in psychiatric examinations, and that some supervisors did not want to hire Negroes. some criticisms of the military side of the program, the plan as a whole was deemed a successful recruiting arrangement. The IG recommended in 1956 that the ceiling be increased from [REDACTED] positions and the DD/P requested that the number of JOT's assigned to his area be trebled. c. Recruiting Clerical Employees

Because of security considerations, CIA claimed that it had to do its own recruiting of clerical workers. This meant that the Agency had to compete with the Civil Service Commission which had general government-wide responsibilities in this field. The Office of Personnel had a special Clerical Recruitment Branch which was responsible for recruiting personnel to meet the Agency clerical needs.^{2/} This Branch faced the general condition of continued scarcity of fully-qualified clerical candidates who were interested in employment in the Washington area. In addition, it faced problems which were peculiar to the Agency. Unlike other agencies, CIA could not hire and place candidates immediately who had demonstrated their clerical skills. Security clearance took at least three months and the practice was to hire candidates and place them during the waiting period in the Interim Assignment Branch where they could brush up their clerical skills and work on such unclassified assignments as were available. This meant that it took time before new clerical workers could be integrated into the work of the Agency. Among prospects, the Interim Assignment Branch did not acquire a good reputation.^{1/} The Clerical Recruitment Branch was sometimes so pressed to get candidates that it had to lower its standards for clerical skills required.

The clerical recruitment problem in the Agency continued to be a chronic one because of the high turnover

^{1/} Report of the Panel on Career Service for Women to the CIA Career Service Board, Career Employment of Women in the Central Intelligence Agency, November 1953, SECRET, stated in Tab E: "Misconceptions, wild rumors and a feeling of being a nameless cipher develop in the Interim Assignment Branch, despite the best efforts of those in charge . . . among this class of employees. The annual separation rate for the lower grades, GS-01-06, which were mostly filled by women clerical employees, was 27.0 for 1953 and 21.3 for 1956.^{1/} In each case the rate was from two to three times higher than the rate for the upper grade groups.

In a general survey which he made of the Office of Personnel in 1953, the Inspector General expressed a concern about the high separation rate of clerical employees. He made the following suggestion regarding this situation:

It is advanced that there would be a lower rate of turnover of clerical employees if the acquiring office was permitted to interview the employee in advance and explain the types of work, working conditions, promotion possibilities, etc.^{2/}

In reply to this suggestion, the Personnel Director pointed out that a placement officer interviewed an employee in advance of his assignment to provide such information. He questioned that an additional interview would be justified in view of the expense involved. He further stated that it was essential that the Personnel Office have final authority over the assignment of clerical personnel since it was responsible for the field recruitment of such personnel.^{1/}

The higher separation rate for clerical employees in 1953 was partially explained on the following grounds.^{2/} Dissatisfaction among clerical employees seemed to stem from lack of career planning for them, misunderstandings about the jobs, non-use of college background, non-use of clerical skills, dead-end aspect of jobs, and inadequate supervision. In 1952 and 1953 Agency recruiters made intensive efforts to recruit college girls for clerical positions, indicating to them the possibility of overseas duty. When overseas assignment was not made immediately, many of the girls so recruited resigned. Later in the period, the Office of Personnel attempted to correct this situation by asking college girls to sign a statement to the effect that they did not expect to go overseas until after they had worked for the Agency for sixteen months. This new procedure improved the situation although the separation rate for college women recruited for clerical positions was still higher than that for high school graduates recruited for such positions.

d. Contract Personnel

For a variety of reasons, CIA hired many employees on a contract basis. In some cases, contract personnel were hired on a temporary basis to meet short-range operational or support needs which could not be met through the use of available staff employees. Foreign nationals residing abroad were not eligible for staff employment and had therefore to be hired as contract agents. As indicated above, the DD/P area divisions had over [REDACTED] such employees in 1956.^{1/}

^{1/} See above, p.140.

When an individual's primary employer or employment interest was not CIA, the additional work he did for CIA was put on a contract basis. Many Office of Training language instructors fell in this category. A contract relationship was also used when the nature of the mission for which the individual was hired precluded his being subject to administrative control or working specifically defined hours.^{1/}

In 1953 the Special Contracting, Allowances and Processing Staff of the Office of Personnel was responsible for recommending policy standards regarding Agency contracts for personnel services and certain other special contracts required in support of covert operations; for preparing and executing such contracts; for the review of all field contracts submitted to headquarters; for the processing of all staff agents; and for reviewing and granting special allowances.^{2/} In 1955

this Staff was changed into a division and its name became the Contract Personnel Division.^{1/}

25X9 The workload of the Staff and the Division concerned with contract personnel did not change 25X9 greatly during the period. Every year there were prepared around [REDACTED] new contracts, [REDACTED] contract 25X9 amendments, and [REDACTED] staff agent personnel actions.^{2/}

In 1955 the Inspector General expressed an interest in the improvement of procedures concerning contract personnel:

Strengthen the procedures governing the handling of contract personnel by requiring that Personnel, General Counsel and the area division participate in all hiring and firing (or contract lapse) actions. This will eliminate many misunderstandings currently arising because contract agents have not been properly informed about their agreement with the Agency. ^{3/}

In commenting on this recommendation, the Director of Personnel stated that his Office upon request had always assisted the operating divisions in signing up agents and explaining their obligations under contracts. He pointed out that his Office was prevented from being of greater service in drawing up contracts because of the plea that security factors precluded his staff from meeting large numbers of clandestine personnel.^{1/}

During the period a number of improvement were made in procedures for handling contract personnel. Regulations were issued which formalized in both headquarters and field standard procedures for the handling of contract personnel.^{2/} Regulations applying to overseas service were also issued on education allowances, home service transfer allowances, standardized allowances, and special allowances.^{3/} The Division participated in development of administrative plans for Agency projects in order to insure standard handling of contract personnel. e. Military Personnel

The large role played in intelligence by military intelligence, the close connection between paramilitary and military operations, and the intimate relationship between covert propaganda and psychological warfare made it inevitable that the Central Intelligence Agency would seek the services of military personnel on special details. The Agency was limited by law to fifteen retired military officers as regular employees, so, as indicated above, it used military personnel on detail of whom there were on the average close to [REDACTED] [REDACTED] during the period. Of the five Directors of

Central Intelligence since its beginning in 1947, four were military men.^{1/} The Central Intelligence Act required the Director or the Deputy Director to be a civilian.

Of the military personnel on detail with the Agency in 1956 about two-thirds were in the DD/P group, one-fourth in the DD/S, and most of the remainder in the Office of DCI. The EE and FE Divisions had the largest contingents of the area divisions and in the DD/S group, the Training, Personnel, Communications, and Logistics Offices had the largest number of military personnel.

The Office of Personnel had throughout the period a Military Personnel Division which was responsible for providing service in the procurement, assignment, administration and disposition of military personnel detailed to the Agency from the Department of Defense. It participated in the development of personnel policies that affected military personnel, it conducted liaison

In 1954 the Director of Personnel conducted a survey of the morale of military personnel detailed to the Agency which he submitted to General Cabell, Deputy Director to Central Intelligence.^{2/} The purpose of this survey was to obtain information regarding the reported unfavorable attitude of service personnel concerning their assignments with CIA, to determine the conditions which might cause such an attitude, and to recommend corrective action in the case of unfavorable conditions noted. The Division reviewed some [REDACTED] exit interviews of service personnel and found that approximately 30 percent felt that their military specialties were not fully utilized and were critical of the Agency in some degree. Among the reasons why officers did not like duty with the Agency were dissatisfaction with Agency efficiency rating methods, isolation from their service, difficulty in obtaining reimbursement for loss of service benefits or additional expenses occasioned by Agency security requirements, lack of proper orientation, and failure within the various echelons of the Agency to practice those fundamental principles of leadership requisite to the development of esprit de corps, pride of accomplishment, and loyalty in a degree which subordinates personal interests to achieve the common goal. The Military Personnel Division took steps to arrange for preliminary pre-assignment interviews, to compile a list of officers interested in Agency type of work, to inform officers that their fears regarding letter efficiency reports were unfounded, to the distribution of the Armed Forces Information Digest, to improve orientation of military personnel, to have the Finance Office refer claims which they turned down to DD/S for possible settlement, and to have the Office of Training include in courses for supervisors instruction in

f. Recruiting Women for CIA Career Services

The Career Service Board appointed a panel in 1953 to investigate the subject, "Career Employment of Women in the Central Intelligence Agency." This panel was referred to internally as the "Petticoat" Panel as it was composed entirely of women. The Panel found that as compared with other Government agencies, CIA had offered at least equivalent opportunities to career women. It had not, in common with other Government agencies, taken full advantage of the womanpower resources available to it. In its report of November 1953, this Panel made the following recommendations:

1. That the DCI issue a policy statement to encourage maximum utilization of women in the Agency.
2. That the DD/A establish a procedure for:

4. That more opportunity be given to qualified women to advance into positions of executive responsibility at all grade levels.

5. That a full-time counsellor be assigned to the Interim Assignment Branch in the Personnel Office.

6. That special attention be given to clerical personnel by the appointment of a qualified person in each major component to deal with problems of clerical personnel.

7. That supervisors provide continuous orientation to employees at the section or unit level, particularly for the clerical personnel.

From the grade distribution comparison of male and female staff personnel at the beginning and end of the period, mixed trends emerge.^{1/} In the upper grade group, GS-13-18, women increased their proportion of total from 2.6 to 3.3 percent. While there were still no women in the supergrades and only two rose to GS-15, the absolute number of women in grades, GS-13-15, rose from 34 to 84. In the middle grades, GS-07--12, women rose from 24.6 to 31.2 percent of the total and in the lower grades, GS-01-06, they rose from 72.5 to 78.0 percent of the total. The concentration of women in the lower grade group was in part the result of more women seeking employment at a younger age than men.^{2/}

The net changes indicated that [REDACTED] more men were in the top grades and [REDACTED] more women, while in the lower grades there were 182 fewer men and 320 more women. In the middle grades the net gains were larger for women than for men, 736 as compared with 357, but it must be remembered that many more men had moved into the upper grades.

2/ As of December 31, 1954, women constituted 99.4 percent of employees under 20 and 78.9 percent of employees 20-24. Office of Personnel, Black Book, Tab T as, loc.cit.

The net change in average grade status for men was .9 increase and for women .6 increase.

In his 1955 Memorandum, "Ten Ways for Improving CIA's Personnel Management," the IG included the following recommendation on women employees:

Place a woman in a senior position (even possibly as high as a second Deputy Assistant Director) in the Personnel Office and charge her with aggressive furthering the careers of women in the Agency. This woman should not only see that women are considered for top-level positions, where there is no requirement that the position be held by a man, but should also insure that women returning from overseas are properly placed.^{1/}

In commenting on this suggestion, the Director of Personnel said that he considered that he was already charged with the responsibility, along with similar responsibilities for all persons, regardless of sex. He felt that he should police this problem rather than have an individual policing him. He asserted that the Office of Personnel was continuously on the alert to see that the best qualified individuals available regardless of sex were hired for or assigned to positions that were vacant. Personnel officers could only inquire into the reasons for job requiring a man rather than a woman, evaluate these reasons, and where the requirement was not realistic, point this out to the operating official and endeavor to change his mind on the matter.^{1/}

There were certain positions in the Agency for which women were not considered. Paramilitary positions were in this class. In the DD/P area there were also a reluctance on the part of area divisions to appoint women as case officers in the field.^{2/} There were women reports analysts and administrative officers in the field stations, but a lack of other field professional positions available to women made it difficult for women professionals to rotate to the field. If women did not get field experience then they could not be considered for certain supervisory positions.

Agency from time to time noted the small proportion of non-Caucasians employed by the Agency.^{1/} There was no Negro intelligence analyst in CIA who attained the eminence achieved by [REDACTED] in OSS during the war.

The number of Negroes employed by the Agency rose from 447 [REDACTED] of all staff employees) as of September 30, 1953 to 727 (almost [REDACTED] of all staff employees) as of December 31, 1957.^{2/} In 1953 there were only 14 Negroes who had reached grades as high as GS-07 (the highest was GS-08) and in 1958 there were only 54 Negroes in grades GS-07-12 (one in GS-12). Most of the Negroes employed by the Agency were in grades GS-06 and below or in the non-GS wage categories. In general, the most common jobs held by Negroes were at the laborer, guard or messenger level. Some Negroes held clerical positions and a few held professional positions.

Of the major components, the highest proportion of Negroes as of December 31, 1957 was found in DD/S (7.5 percent) and DD/I (7.0 percent) and the lowest in DD/P (1.6 percent). DD/I had the largest number of Negro clerical employees. [REDACTED] established a pool of Negro typists who worked on the daily bulletins. High standards of typing performance were necessary to be assigned to this pool but the positions in the pool offered little opportunity for promotion.

There were a number of factors which kept the number of Negroes hired by the Agency from growing more rapidly than it did considering the rate of growth of the Negro population in Washington, D.C. Negroes normally gained entrance into the Federal Service during the period through Civil Service examinations. CIA did not use Civil Service registers for its recruitment. Negroes tended to gravitate to large offices such as the Census Bureau which had acquired a reputation for hiring large numbers of Negroes. CIA had no such reputation and it did not have the need to hire as many clerical employees as the Census Bureau did. The proportion of Negroes with the education and skills needed for intelligence work was small. There were relatively few Negro area specialists, language specialists, economists, scientific researchers, social science analysts, and psychologists--to mention a few of the specialists in demand in intelligence operations. As indicated above in the discussion of recruitment of Junior Officer Trainees, it was extraordinarily difficult to find Negro college graduates who could meet the qualifications established for the program.^{1/}

In accordance with relevant executive orders, CIA had throughout the period an officer charged with enforcing in CIA the policy of the United States Government that equal opportunity be afforded all qualified persons, consistent with the law, for employment in the Federal Government.^{2/} Prior to January 18, 1955, this officer was called CIA Fair Employment Officer and after that date CIA Employment Policy Officer.^{1/} During the period these officers were appointed from the staff of the Inspector General.^{2/} The Federal policy prohibited discrimination against any Agency employee or applicant for Agency employment because of race, color, religion, or national origin. The CIA Officer was under the immediate supervision of the Director for all matters pertaining to Agency employment policy, including any investigation and recommendation regarding instances of alleged discrimination. to give due consideration to the fact that the National Security Act of 1947 and the Central Intelligence Act of 1949 provided that the DCI was responsible for protecting intelligence sources and methods from unauthorized disclosure. To this end the Director of Security was charged with assisting and guiding the CIA Employment Policy Officer on all cases and with coordinating with the Chief, CI Staff, DD/P in all security aspects of cases involving DD/P personnel.

There were just two or three charges of discrimination which were brought to the CIA Employment Policy Officer during the period. The Office of Personnel did not know of any applicants who complained of discrimination.^{1/}

6. Personnel Utilization Policies and Practices

During the period operating officials continued to have primary responsibility for personal utilization including assignment, rotation, evaluation, promotion, and termination. With the advent of the Career Service structure, each Head of a given Career Service assumed a decentralized responsibility for personnel management within internal confines of his Career Service. The Office of Personnel retained centralized responsibility for advice on personnel utilization activities and for negotiation of rotation or reassignment of personnel between Career Service jurisdictions. Placement officers from the Office of Personnel worked with Career Management officers of Career Boards and were in most instances assigned to permanent attendance at board meetings for purposes of providing technical advice and assistance.

At the beginning of the period the personnel utilization activities of the Office of Personnel were divided between the Personnel Division (Overt) and the Personnel Division (Covert). The reorganization of September 1953 combined these two divisions into the Personnel Utilization Division (PUD). This move brought all personnel placement officers under one division chief and permitted an increased exchange of information and experience between personnel officers representing the various operating offices. There was, however, a senior placement officer for each of the main areas of the Agency; DD/A, DD/I, and DD/P.^{1/}

The establishment of PUD came about the time that the Agency was scaling down its personnel requirements and placing more emphasis upon rotation. The Director of Central Intelligence had established personnel ceilings for all offices which were considerably below T/O figures.^{2/} The main work load in PUD shifted from advice on initial placement to advice on internal reassignment problems.

a. Assignment, Rotation and Career Planning Program

Improvement in assignment practices was one of the primary concerns of Agency officials developing the

^{1/} The name of this unit was changed to Personnel Assignment Division on 7 March 1955. Three branches were continued to furnish personnel support to the Career Boards and Panels of DD/I, DD/P, and DD/S. Office of Personnel Memorandum No. 20-190-16, 24 May 1955, SECRET, in OP files.

Career Service program. There was a steady increase in the consideration of the long-range implications of assignment actions and a general trend toward more central review and control of assignment practices through the Career Service system.

Regular rotation between headquarters and the field was one of the essentials of a Career Service, particularly in DD/P. At the beginning of the period the assignment of individuals to posts in headquarters and overseas was left to individual components, area division, senior staffs, and offices. An individual had to be acceptable to an area division or a staff headquarters office in order to be placed. This system of highly developed autonomy upon the part of components made it difficult in some cases for an individual outside a given area division to move from headquarters to the field or for a person in one area to move to another.

During 1953 the FI and PP Career Service Boards were responsible for reassignment practices and gave primary consideration to those affecting overseas returnees. Gradually, more and more information about returnees was made available to these Boards by the area divisions concerned. The Boards were principally concerned with effecting proper assignments for individuals who could not be properly assigned through the efforts of the operating components.^{1/}

The Inspector General in his memorandum: "Ten Ways for Improving CIA's Personnel Management" recognized in early 1955 the need for strengthening the assignment procedures of the Agency.^{2/}

Place overseas returnees in positions before they return. This is not solely a problem for the Office of Personnel, but is one that can be solved by Personnel, DD/S and DD/P. It has been one of our sorest spots in personnel management, but one to my mind susceptible to easy solution by good administration and strong central control of personnel by DD/P. I would set a deadline of 30 June 1955 by which time every returnee will have a job waiting.

Eliminate placement by file shopping. If an employee is misplaced, he or she should be relocated by a system of interviews, and a placement officer should handcarry the file to interested supervisors.

Imbue in all employees in the Personnel Office and all supervisors that people are our most valuable asset--the good ones should be encouraged and assisted, the poor ones eliminated. But regardless of whether good or poor, they should be handled as human beings not as files, numbers or inanimate objects. I believe that the attitude, typified by referring to personnel as "surplus" like war goods or wheat, has been at the root of some of our management.

The above three points were aimed specifically at the confusion which resulted from the drastic reduction

25X1A [REDACTED]. During the period of 25X1A Allied occupation of [REDACTED] the Agency had 25X1A built up a large staff in [REDACTED] 25X1C [REDACTED] With the end of occupational troubles in finding new positions and during the time that they were unassigned they were classified as "surplus." ^{1/}

During this crisis the Office of Personnel worked out an emergency placement program. All recruitment requests submitted in the DD/P were held in the Office of Personnel pending a full review against two sources:

(1) the reassignment roster, and (2) machine runs against coded qualifications requested in the recruitment request. The special reassignment rosters were prepared in collaboration with the personal officers of the operating units to develop accurate lists of returnees from overseas for whom no reassignment had been determined. The roster was indexed by number. Each number corresponded to the name of the employee maintained on a separate master list. Full biographic information relative to experience and qualifications of employees was listed by number on the reassignment roster. Placement officers reviewed the experience and qualifications of employees for whom reassignment was necessary. The information was forwarded to the appropriate operating component which had issued vacancy notices requiring the same or similar qualifications with requests for a review of all biographic information and personal interviews of the nominee. In many cases, this information was forwarded to appropriate components, even though vacancy notices had not been published, with a view toward meeting attrition requirements.^{1/}

^{1/} Office of Personnel, Materials Furnished to Historical Staff, 30 January 1959, CONFIDENTIAL, in HS files.

With the large number of persons appearing in 1953 and 1954 on the reassignment roster, this procedure broke down. As a result, many of these employees were forced to seek employment on their own, utilizing personal relations with various key operating officers.

By late 1954, after the greater portion of the returnees from the reduced [REDACTED] had been suitably placed, this process was replaced by current reviews of all recruitment requests and EOD requests at the DD/P level in terms of authorized ceiling. Applicants were entered on duty only with the approval of DD/P. This latter practice continued through 1956 with the continued stringency of ceiling allocation.

In 1956, the DD/I instituted procedures that were designed to provide maximum opportunities for DD/I Career Designees to advance to higher-graded vacant positions. When any DD/I component had a vacant position to be filled, the vacancy was published in terms of all pertinent information throughout all DD/I Career Services. Any DD/I employee was eligible to apply for consideration for the vacant job. Such applications were forwarded through the appropriate DD/I Career Service for review. Upon the approval of that Career Service, the application was sent to the Career Service having jurisdiction over the operating component in which the vacancy existed. The Career Service interested in filling the vacancy was expected to interview a maximum of three qualified nominees in the event that the total applications exceeded that number. In the event applications were less than three in number, all applicants were to be personally interviewed. If on the basis of the total applications received, the Career Service with the vacancy felt that there were no qualified individuals within the DD/I to fill the job, external recruitment requests were forwarded to the Personnel Assignment Division for review and subsequent forwarding to Personnel Procurement Division for the issuance of recruitment requisition.^{1/}

The DD/P was also moving in the direction of more orderly reassignment of returnees.^{2/} Among the obstacles had been the reluctance of the individual to agree to a definite next assignment before he returned and the suspicion which returnees viewed efforts to place them. DD/P was confident that the Clandestine Services career management officers were becoming steadily more effective as negotiators and educators in the assignment field. He held orderly reassignment was complicated by the inflexibility of slots, which prevented them from changing their staffing pattern to meet rapidly changing requirements, and by the length of time it took to adjudicate conflicting demands for personnel among so many branches, divisions, and staffs, all understaffed so far as really first-class personnel was concerned.

^{2/} Memorandum for DCI from DD/P, 5 April 1955, Subject: Memorandum from the IG, Ten Ways for Improving CIA's Personnel Management, dated 25 February 1955, SECRET, in O/DCI/ER.

The Director of Personnel agreed that it had become a generally accepted principle that an individual who satisfactorily completed a field assignment would be appropriately reassigned.^{1/} The effective implementation of this policy required that the reassignment of field personnel should be carefully planned and finally determined, if possible, before the expiration of their tours of duty in the field.

^{1/} Memorandum for DCI from DP, dated 18 April 1955, Subject: Ten Ways for Improving CIA's Personnel Management, SECRET, in O/DCI/ER.

It was with this end in view that the Field Reassignment Questionnaire had been designed by task forces of senior FI and PP officers appointed to study the Clandestine Services Career Program. This questionnaire, ^{1/} due eight months in advance of the expiration of overseas tours, contained information about the major duties of individuals in the field, their preferences for next assignments, and their need for headquarters training. It became a priority action paper in the Career Service elements where Career Service Boards, Career Management Officers, Placement Officers, supervisors, and returnees were working together properly on reassignment problems.

In order to facilitate the advance determination of assignments by providing long-range guidance to supervisory and Career Service elements, work was initiated in 1955 on a Career Preference Outline which became the basis for the Agency Regulation on Career Planning for Individuals. ^{2/} This outline was a documented description of the individual's career interests and proposed career activities for an appropriate specified time, to which were appended the comments of his supervisor and his Career Service. The proposals expressed by the individual might include suggested retention in present position, reassignment, or training. Either the individual or his supervisor, with the concurrence of the Head of his Career Service, could initiate the preparation of an outline. This program had the advantage of encouraging deliberate consideration of the long-range utilization of individuals in the interest of the Clandestine Services as a whole.

b. Employee Rating

Considerable attention was paid during the period 1953-1956 to improving the system used by supervisors for rating or evaluating their subordinates. The initial evaluation system in the Career Service program was based on the Personnel Evaluation Report (PER) introduced in 1952. It was superseded by the first Fitness Report, introduced on an experimental basis in November 1954, which was designed to provide a report more suitable for selection purposes.^{1/} At the same time a study was started to find out what supervisors at all levels wanted in a fitness report. This approach recognized the controversial nature of fitness reporting, there being almost as many opinions about it as there were people. The study included an analysis of the replies of supervisors to the questionnaire circulated about the November 1954 Fitness Report, an analysis of the content of completed Fitness Reports and statistical studies pertaining thereto, interviews with operating officials, administrative officers, supervisors, and personnel officers, and development of a proposed Fitness Report based on majority opinion which, in turn, was submitted to further criticism and revision.^{2/} Out of this emerged a revised Fitness Report which the Career Council adopted.^{3/}

The Fitness Report was designed so that both the interests of the employees and of management would be considered. This was done by differentiating between the evaluation of job performance -- the subject held to be of particular concern to the employee and his immediate supervisors, and the evaluation of potential -- the subject held to be of particular interest to secondary levels of supervision and to career service elements. The performance part was designed to elicit the supervisor's opinion concerning the on-the-job performance of the individual. It was concerned with the productivity and quality of performance of the employee on the job he was performing. Except under unusual circumstances, the employee had the right to see this part after completion by the supervisor. The supervisor might elect not to show the report to the employee when unusual operational conditions so warranted, when, for medical or psychological reasons, it would be ill-advised to show the individual the report, and when security considerations precluded showing the report. The potential part was designed to provide operating officials and personnel officers with an opinion concerning the potential of the employee. Such information was needed for consideration of the employee's assignment, promotion, selection for membership in the Career Staff and other actions affecting his status. It was decided that this part would not be shown to the individual being rated.^{1/}

c. Promotion Policies and Practices

In order to attract and to hold able employees CIA had to have a liberal promotion policy. The burden and inconvenience of the security regulations, the limitations on outside activities, the risk of certain overseas assignments, and the moral questions raised by some of the clandestine activities called for a high degree of patriotism that the top officials thought should be rewarded by a generous promotion policy.

The annual promotion rates of staff personnel, as calculated from the monthly average on duty and the cumulative number of promotions each year, showed a fairly high level for the period as a whole. There was a decline toward the end of the period but this was the result of the personnel freeze rather than the result of a change in promotion policy. During the calendar year 1953 there was 45.4 promotions for every hundred employees on duty during an average month. During the calendar year 1956, the promotion rate was 34.0. The highest promotion rate was for the Office of the Director and the rates for other offices placed them in the following descending rank order: DD/S, DD/P, and DD/I.^{1/}

During the period the Agency commonly followed the practice of underslotting, i.e., assigning employees to positions graded higher than the employee's grade. As the employee acquired experience and demonstrated his ability he would be slotted into the higher grade. This practice meant that there was headroom for promotions. As indicated below, this practice was contrary to the Civil Service classification system which required that a position of a given grade could be filled only by a person who already had the qualifications for that grade.^{2/} The practice began before 1953 when the Agency was rapidly expanding and could not always find candidates with the exact qualifications for the positions to be filled. It was formalized in 1954 by an Agency Regulation which was popularly known as the "Black Duck" Regulation.^{1/} This Regulation provided that an employee might be assigned to a position classified at a higher grade or a lower grade than his present grade. The declining promotion rate would seem to indicate that the practice was less common at the end of the period than it was at the beginning. With the slowing down of recruitment, with the low turnover rate in the higher grades, the opportunities for promotion were less at the end of the period than at the beginning.

The system of competitive promotion, started in the fall of 1956, provided for a periodic (not less than once per year) competitive consideration for promotion of all employees who had met time-in-grade requirements for promotion.^{1/} Employees of a given Career Service competed for promotions with all others of the same grade level and in the same general occupational field. Thus, within the Support Career Service, every employee with personnel as his occupational career designation would compete with every other employee of that designation and the same GS grade. For grade levels GS-7 through GS-14, Competitive Evaluation Panels were established by the head of the Career Service to rank all employees at each grade level who were in competition for promotion. Criteria considered in the ranking included performance as shown by productivity, quality, and level of job performed, qualifications as shown by education, experience, training and personal characteristics, value of employee to the Agency as shown by present usefulness and future potential, and acceptance of Career Staff obligations. Information on these factors was obtained by review of employee performance as shown by Biographic Profile, a summary of biographic, service and performance information prepared by the Office of Personnel from the personnel

folder, Fitness Reports, qualification records, and through employee and supervisor interviews. Final rankings were computed as a composite of individual rankings with equal weight being given to each panel member's judgment.^{1/}

Upon completion of Panel Evaluation, the Head of the Career Service used the rank order list as a guide in recommending promotion actions to the Director of Personnel. Competitive promotions were made on the basis of merit, not on the basis of availability of positions of a higher grade. Persons promoted under competitive evaluation procedures might occupy a position lower in grade than their grade after promotion when it was necessary in the best interests of the Agency that they were retained in such a position in a personal rank assignment status. It was also possible that they might occupy positions higher in grade than their grade after promotion, when necessary. On the other hand, personnel promoted had to meet established qualification requirements and had to be assigned to a position of appropriate grade either upon promotion or as soon as they could be released from the job they held. As a control mechanism, each Career Service and competitive area within a Career Service had to keep the grades of personnel in line with the grades of the positions which the Career Service was responsible for staffing.^{1/}

The competitive promotion system was actually in effect in 1956 for personnel in grades GS-13 and GS-14 in the Clandestine Services Career Service. Various other systems involving varying degrees of competitive selection for promotion were in effect in other Career Services. The Agency-wide system was set up at the close of 1956.

7. Personnel Classification Policies and Practices

Because of security requirements, CIA was exempted from the Classification Act of 1949.^{2/} Civil Service Commission classification experts could not come to the Agency and demand a full description of the positions in the Clandestine Services. On the other hand, it was Agency policy to adhere to the provisions of this Act insofar as possible and to follow the basic classification principles and compensation schedules in order to assure that employees would receive equality of compensation for work performance.^{1/}

In his paper on the Philosophy of Career Service, the DD/S placed great emphasis upon the need that each manager have a clear definition of requirements for each job under his jurisdiction. The organization of CIA had to be fluid in order to respond to constantly varying demands made upon it. In some jobs absolute conformity was needed and in others maximum creativity was desired. Both of these needs put a special obligation on all supervisors and managers to evaluate subordinate positions frequently and to be able to define clearly at all times not only the obvious basic requirements for the immediate jobs under them but also the subtler requirements of attitudes and understandings.^{2/}

The Personnel Evaluation Division (known in 1953 and 1954 as the Classification and Wage Division) was charged with making individual job analyses and organizational surveys in cooperation with supervisors in order to present job information in a form of maximum usefulness for recruitment, placement, management of personnel, training and career development.^{1/} It established the various classes of positions, the grade levels within each class, and also reviewed the way in which the classification plan was being carried out throughout the Agency. It made comparisons of jobs and positions descriptions in the Department of State and in industry with those in CIA. It also reviewed proposed changes in Tables of Organization. The Division was organized into a Covert Branch, an Overt Branch, and a Surveys and Standards Staff.

Special operating conditions in the Agency made it difficult to follow in all cases the established classification practices. Rapidly changing operational situations dictated classification review and decisions frequently without benefit of detailed information from operating units on organizational functions, programs, relationships, or the duties of individual positions. This was contrary to classification principles. In addition, the highly classified and sensitive nature of some programs, operations and responsibilities of individual positions required special classification methods and techniques.^{1/}

In his survey of the Office of Personnel in 1953, the Inspector General expressed an interest in the peculiar classification problems of the Agency:

There is no question that a classification system is required. It is also agreed that the Civil Service wage scale is acceptable. What is required is perhaps a classification system tailored exclusively to the requirements of CIA. ^{2/}

The Acting Assistant Director for Personnel in commenting on this observation stated that the Agency's

^{1/} In 1955 the DD/P expressed his concern for the need for more flexible procedures in personnel classification. See Memorandum for DCI from DD/P, 5 April 1955, Ten Ways for Improving CIA's Personnel Management, SECRET, in O/DCI/ER.

problem with respect to classification was due to a lack of understanding among operating components concerning the purposes of classification and their reluctance to accept the application of any classification system. He contended that the experience of Government and industry alike had demonstrated the need for systematic classification of positions. This was a highly technical process which involved consideration of occupational and qualifications information as well as pay. He pointed out that the Atomic Energy Commission, also exempt from the Classification Act of 1949, found itself in serious difficulty with Congress when it failed to administer its classification plan in accordance with the basic principles stated in that Act.^{1/}

During 1953 the Classification and Wage Division prepared regulations which spelled out the requirements for the preparation of position descriptions and contained an explanation of allocation factors for Agency positions.^{2/} The Division likewise developed an

The publication of new information regarding position standards continued during the balance of the period. In 1954 these publications were used in resolving differences with operating offices on proposed grade structures of reorganized Tables of Organization. In 1955, analytical studies were undertaken by the Division to increase the flexibility of the position classification system in order to conform to the concepts of the Career Service program.

The Personnel Evaluation Division played an active role in the development of the manpower control system which was tried out on an experimental basis in the Office of Communications in 1956 and later extended to the entire Agency.^{2/} One of the purposes of the new system was to provide flexibility in position structure (types, levels, organizational location of positions) to enable responsible supervisors to shift personnel to meet changed workload requirements. The system first made the distinction between a "staffing complement" and a "development complement." Employees actually assigned to and engaged in productive work were placed on the "staffing complement." Employees in a temporary status of travel, training, or other interim assignment were put on the "development complement." Positions on the staffing complement were subdivided into "limited positions" and "flexible positions." "Limited positions" were those for which a maximum number of occupants was indicated. This maximum had to be adhered to except for authorized overlap for job orientation. Thus there could only be one division chief except for the temporary overlap when a division chief was being replaced. "Flexible positions" were those proposed for multiple occupancy as needs dictated. This system made possible the movement of personnel into flexible positions without requiring the revision of personnel planning papers or the reclassification of positions. One of the purposes of the system was to place more emphasis upon the annual planning of personnel needs rather than upon the minute review of the classification of new positions and the reclassification of existing positions.

8. Termination Policies and Practices

The Director's plenary authority to terminate the employment of any officer or employee of the Agency under Section 102(c) of the National Security Act of 1947 continued to be a central feature of the Agency personnel system.^{1/} It was a power which remained in the background but every effort was made to insure that full information and pertinent recommendations were available for the Director's consideration when he decided to take such action. An Employment Review Board was established in 1954 to consider separation cases of a highly sensitive nature.^{2/}

The Office of Personnel continued to furnish operating officials with technical advice and guidance on termination cases. Separations were conducted for the most part under procedures which conformed to the provisions of Civil Service Regulations. Problems of adequate documentation, legal conformance to the Veterans Preference Act, adequately designed trial periods, and suitable notification to the employee concerned in the form of warning letters and letter of charges were of concern to the Office of Personnel in disciplinary terminations.^{1/} Every effort was made to avoid appeals to the Civil Service Commission since the review process might expose intelligence sources or methods.^{2/} In a few cases, those involving security considerations, the Director's plenary authority to terminate was recommended by the Director of Personnel.

Toward the end of the period, the DCI apparently concluded that the termination of mediocre employees was advisable in the interest of the United States and could be effected under this same statutory provision.^{1/} The details of the selection out program were worked out after the period under discussion.

9. Career Benefits

The reports of some of the Task Forces made in 1953 and 1954 indicate that certain Agency officials thought at that time that membership in the Career Staff would carry certain benefits and rights which would set the Staff apart from the Civil Service and gave it a position midway between the Foreign Service and the main body of Civil Servants. The Agency had broadened earlier the interpretation of its own authority to provide for medical care for overseas employees that was not directly connected with their employment.^{2/} Beyond this and the insurance and incentive awards plans, membership in the Career Staff did not bring immediate benefits which were substantially different from those enjoyed by Civil Service employees.

Continuous consideration was given during the period to ways in which career service in CIA could be made more attractive. A Legislative Task Force reported in August 1953 on suggestions related to legislation that might be required for the establishment of a career service.^{1/} It proposed a statutory basis for a CIA career service similar to that of the Foreign Service. Its proposals included additional medical benefits, educational allowances, a more liberal retirement system, and certain home leave benefits for employees who had served long periods of time overseas. Amendments of Central Intelligence Act of 1949 which dealt with home leave, travel, storage, transportation, and medical care of dependents were proposed to Congress in 1956. The DCI pointed out in a letter accompanying the bill that the Agency was not requesting benefits or privileges over and beyond those enjoyed or being requested by other agencies with important responsibilities in the foreign field.^{1/} The bill was not passed by this Congress. As the period ended, the Agency was planning to redraft and resubmit the amendments at the next Congress.^{2/}

One of the employee benefits systems that was improved during the period was the insurance and claims program for Agency personnel which was run by the Employee Services Staff in the beginning of 1953, by the Insurance and Claims Branch of the Employee Services Division after the reorganization of September 1953, and by Insurance and Casualty Division after the reorganization of June 1955. This activity included Agency-sponsored insurance programs, the Federal Employees Group Life Insurance program, and casualty benefits under the Federal Employees Compensation Act and under the Central Intelligence Agency Act. Included in these programs were life, health and accident, hospitalization, and air travel insurance.^{3/}

The staff engaged in these activities issued insurance policies, collected premiums, adjusted claims, and maintained liaison with underwriters. The mandates of Agency security required an unusual type of handling in administering the insurance, benefit and casualty functions. These programs were maintained in a secure manner by retaining all individual insurance records within the Agency.^{1/} With the adoption of new insurance plans, there was a considerable increase in the number of new applications for coverage.^{2/}

In discussing a recommendation of the Inspector General regarding pushing claims under Federal Employees Compensation Act, the Director of Personnel pointed out that the Department of Labor Bureau in charge had expressed the view in 1954 that claims submitted by CIA were as thoroughly investigated and as well documented as any they received. A comparison of the percentage of CIA claims approved compared favorably with the average percentage of claims approved in the Government as a whole. Through experience in the actual processing of cases, the Bureau of Employee's Compensation became increasingly familiar with the requirements of the unusual cases peculiar to CIA.^{1/}

The incentive awards system was continued and expanded during the period. This system provided for the granting of Honor and Suggestion Awards to persons who significantly contributed to the intelligence effort of the United States or who contributed to the efficiency of operations, security, morale, or working conditions of CIA. The Incentive Awards Committee (later called the Incentive Awards Board and still later the Suggestion Awards Committee) and the Honor Awards Board were continued as separate bodies.^{2/} Until August 26, 1955 responsibility for the administration of these two programs was in the Office of Personnel but on that date the Incentive Awards Program was transferred to the Management Staff.^{1/} The Honor Awards Program for personal deeds of valor and for singularly meritorious performance remained under the supervision of the Office of Personnel. In 1953 the Agency secured Presidential approval for the National Security Medal.^{2/} With the passage of the Government Employees' Incentive Awards Act of 1954 the top amount of an incentive award that could be granted by the Agency was increased from $1,000 to $5,000 but system of salary increases for superior accomplishment was eliminated.^{3/} Under liberalized rules, intangible benefits to the Agency as well as tangible benefits were considered in making Suggestion Awards.^{4/}

On his comments on Career Service after eight years experience with the system, the DD/S said that there was more good to be gained from striving for intangible benefits brought about by good personnel administration and good management than from emphasizing tangible benefits. He nevertheless thought that tangible benefits were important for the appropriate people under the right circumstances. In the beginning too much emphasis had been placed on tangible benefits. This was a false lure and an unfortunately false goal for the members of the Career Service. Realistic and reasonable benefits would evolve naturally as a result of improved and seasoned personnel practices and when conferred in the proper context - i.e., recognized accomplishment in reference to stipulated Agency needs - would be accepted by all.^{1/}

10. General Trends

During the period CIA scaled down its ambitious plans for recruiting new personnel. While there was increased emphasis upon rotation between headquarters and the field, there was a decrease in overseas staff positions.

^{1/} Memorandum for DCI from DD/S, 17 May 1960, Response to Inspector General's Survey on Career Service, CONFIDENTIAL.

Increased attention was given to long-range career planning, to the re-examination after three years of the question of suitability, and to office-wide and Agency-wide personnel needs.

CIA moved in the direction of a personnel system which gave the operating components a greater degree of flexibility to utilize their assets to meet work requirements than would have been possible had the Agency adhered rigidly to the Civil Service classification system which required that a position of a given grade had to be filled by a person who had the qualifications for that grade. The new CIA system provided for an over-all grade authorization. As long as a component stayed within its ceiling and grade control system, it could shift people around and promote them competitively, without coming back to the Management Staff, the Office of Personnel, and the DD/S for reclassification. The new system gave top management an opportunity to plan salary and wage scale and manpower needs for an entire year. The Agency system did not emphasize the man as did the Foreign Service of the Department of State under which a Foreign Service Officer was given a grade and it was up to the Personnel Office to find him a position. The CIA system was in between the Civil Service system and the Foreign Service system. It established a framework of jobs on the basis of reasonable cost and at the same time permitted persons to be promoted on a competitive basis.
